Psychosocial Dynamics Conducive to Torture and Ill-treatment

Background:

- Since 2016, I have been subjected to Counterintelligence Disruption Campaigns. These operations have little separation from domestic terror activities and operations. In fact, they seek to create illicitly defined “enemies” for the express purpose of justifying their own existence and ever-expanding budgets. These disruption campaigns directly involve sleep deprivation, noise harassment, invasion of privacy, psychological / no-touch torture, 24/7 surveillance, constant stalking, and “mobbing.”

The relevant psychosocial dynamics conducive to torture and ill-treatment :

- Much of what occurs is because the perpetrators have a sense of being above the law due to their activities being covered under the guise of absolute secrecy, non-disclosure agreements, and national security. They exert a perverted form of patriotism, in which they “are the law” and civil society is subverted into enemy combatants. Those involved see themselves as being above the law and not accountable to the Constitution because they are serving the “greater good.”

Recommended normative, institutional and policy measures of prevention and mitigation:

- All programs operated against the public and citizens of their own nations must be disclosed. If national blacklisting, neighborhood watch programs, and disruption campaigns are to occur, then the public they “service” must be aware of these activities. The morality and legality of their existence whatsoever is beyond question, especially considering the torture apparatus they utilize when exerted en-masse, however oversight of non-partisan individuals outside of the industries in which their subordinates operate is crucial in assuring a return to the “rule of law” by those most sworn to uphold it. The formerly incarcerated must also be free of the binds of their former punishment, fully-abled to seek freedom of employment and upward mobility having served their “debt to society.” Western prisons of a medieval nature must also be destroyed, with a renewed focus on actual corrections and return to productive civil society.
